and purchase books at discounted prices. Faculty members were especially keen to recommend relevant books to students, while many students used the opportunity to explore and purchase books related to their field of study. The library staff also utilized the library's webOPAC system to explore available titles, aiding them in selecting the right resources for students.

Objectives Achieved: The event attracted a large number of visitors, including professors, researchers, students, and book enthusiasts. It successfully promoted the library's resources, encouraging better utilization among students and faculty. Additionally, the exhibition fostered a deeper connection between students and academic literature by allowing participants to explore a wide range of books. Furthermore, the event ensured access to the latest publications and academic resources, enriching the library's collection, while encouraging active engagement between faculty and students, creating a collaborative academic environment.

Feedback: The feedback received from visitors was overwhelmingly positive. Faculty members appreciated the diverse collection of books and expressed interest in holding more such exhibitions in the future. Many students felt that the event provided them with valuable insights into books that are crucial for their academic growth.

Overall, the Two-Day Book Exhibition-cum-Sale was a resounding success, fulfilling its aim of promoting academic resources and fostering a culture of reading and knowledge-sharing. The library looks forward to organizing more such events in the future to further enhance its role as a pivotal resource center for academic excellence.
